DECLASSIFIED

November 24, 1961 - Friday

Richard Gardner, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for International Organizations, came to see me this morning, to report on his recent travels around Europe. He found the GATT people in Geneva disturbed over the growing strength of OECD, which they fear may trench upon their prerogatives.

I attended the monthly meeting of the Latin American Ambassadors, held today at the Guatemalan Legation. Most of them were there, and we had a jolly time, as usual. These are essentially good will occasions, but the diplomats present speak with great frankness to each other.

Back in the office, I saw Senator Miller from Iowa, who has been making [redacted] economic studies in Europe.

E and I left, with Virginia Craig, at 5:45, for Bath, to stay with the Christopher Chancellors. We arrived at the Chancellors for a late dinner. Their daughter-in-law, Alice, was staying there, with her baby.

Christopher, John Chancellor, and I went off early this morning to the house of John's father-in-law, Lord Hylton. Hylton has a beautiful place, called Ammerdow in Somerset, with about 7,000 acres of land. His guests, besides ourselves, were his son John, Lord Ingleby (formerly Oliver Peake of the Foreign Office), the Marquess of Bath, who owns that beautiful place, Longleat, and a neighboring land owner, Mr. Hutchinson. We were six guns, and the two young men went with the
